Gaming Corps newly appointed CEO Mike Doyle comments

Gaming Corps (Nasdaq: GCOR) new CEO, Mike Doyle, who took office on Tuesday, May 22, 2018, gives the following comments and clarifications.

I am confident that I can be instrumental in turning Gaming Corps around and helping to develop it into the innovative, creative and profitable gaming company it has the potential to become. I have extensive production and business negotiation experience and my career has always been defined by both relentless work ethic and high integrity. I would not be involved if I did not sincerely believe that I can make a large and positive impact on this company and its shareholders.

I also guarantee that I will work hard to ensure that the company will not be managed in the way it has been by the departing CEO and the previous board - nor will the company be financed to the same extent through external parties. The money that we both have and raise will be directed towards sound business opportunities that have been vetted by a rigorous diligence process. To that end we believe that primary shareholders must be given the opportunity to supply such capital and to enjoy the benefit of that investment.

I see a strategic direction for gaming Corps where the company continues to reduce financial risk by outsourcing work-for-hire projects to Redfly Studio in Austin. In parallel we will seek to create lasting value through a combination of wholly owned IP based projects, innovative creative partnerships and licensed game development. I have already identified a number of projects which suit this strategy and it is precisely those opportunities that led me to join Gaming Corps in the capacity of CEO.

You can contact me at ir@gamingcorps.com . If possible, write in English. I will also be attending the AGM in Stockholm on Thursday May 31st, 2018 and look forward to seeing some of you there in person.
