

newchapterlearning

Role Specific Learning – what's your experience of it

As technology develops and time for learning within business hours becomes more challenging, more and more businesses are relying on individuals taking responsibility for their learning. What support and direction are individuals getting to help guide them in the types of learning that will be suitable for their roles?

In larger organisations, with specific Learning and Development departments, you sometimes find Intranet sites with Role specific learning sites. Sites that have been developed to support staff in understanding the training that's available to them. Whether that's internal training, mentoring or peer to peer learning or in some cases, signposting them to external learning sources.

What if you don't work in an organisation with these types of resources? How are smaller organisations supporting their staff with the 70:20:10 model and helping them with self study options too?

Join in the discussion and share what your experience is of role specific training. How are you supported by your company with your personal development? Or if you work in an L & D role yourself, how do you support your staff in understanding what learning will be useful for their role? What's worked for you?

For direct contact on this contact m.holmes@newchapterlearning.co.uk

Mark Carton

mark@lateraladvertising.co.uk

0191 5641444

If you plan, design or deliver learning, New Chapter Learning can help you to start a new chapter in your business success.

Through passing on a few of our tried and tested secret recipes, we can help you to improve learner engagement whilst reducing delivery costs and improving the impact of training investment.

The team at New Chapter Learning is passionate about learning, we champion personal and organisational development through learning, and we recognise that training professionals need opportunities to learn too. Our customers tell us that we've helped them to start a new chapter in their business success by introducing learning that sticks, and we'd really love to help you to start your own new chapter too